receive these benefits, one must retire at age 55.

"It seems there are different sets of rules for different people," Rowe said. "It is our obligation to faculty to go by the handbook, and when we go against it, we set a precedence that the handbook isn't valid."

"We have to be guardians of this document," Maynard said.

Senate members also discussed the athletic budget.

Following a request made by senate members at the April 6 meeting, Bailey invited members of administration, including ASU President Dr. Leslie Wyatt, to meet with the senate Friday to discuss the Athletic Department's planned use of university cash reserves. Bailey said that Wyatt and the other members of administration were unable to attend Friday's meeting.

According to Bailey, the Athletic Department budget report verifies that the auxiliary reserves used by the Athletic Department have been depleted. The department will be loaned $1.7 million from the university cash reserves.

Maynard said the faculty should reexamine at their priorities.

"We've already learned from the finance committee that the money spent on academics is less than 30 percent, and the number of faculty is also declining," he said.

Rowe said the university is having difficulty hiring people because of better salaries offered by competing universities.

"We're hiring people with less credentials to fit a budget line," Rowe said. "If we're going to be competing on a PhD level, we need to be hiring the right people."

"If we had half of what the Athletic Department receives, we would have an outstanding advising center and an outstanding mentoring program," Dee Layton, instructor in developmental studies, said.

This money also could go into a health program for faculty, Maynard said.

"If we can justify tapping into university cash reserves for football, then why not for health care and salaries," Wang said.

No action was taken regarding this discussion

In other business, the Senate:

- discussed the results of the Profession Committee's faculty survey for spring 2001. The committee did not make any specific recommendations from the survey results.

Dr. Joanna Grymes, associate professor of early childhood education, said the committee made the survey simpler this year compared with past surveys. The survey consisted of four basic questions and a final question that allowed faculty to elaborate on what types of rewards would make them feel more valued by the university.

- voted to appoint Dr. Richard Freer, assistant professor of social work, to the University Teaching and Learning Center Board.
